CHAPTER III THE ANALYSIS OF DRY COLORS, PASTES, AND LIQUID PAINTS Treatment of Sample. -- In case of pastes and liquid paints take enough of the sample to permit of all necessary future tests and for analysis, put it in a suitable glass and add benzene. In the case of colors in japan and varnish, first wash thoroughly with turpentine before adding benzene, as the latter is liable to precipitate any gums present on the pigment, in which case they will not redissolve. (The turpentine should be added slowly with constant stirring.) Set the sample aside and let settle until the benzene is clear, then decant, adding fresh benzene and repeating until the color is free from oil. The color should be allowed to settle completely before the benzene is decanted, otherwise some of the lighter materials which do not settle readily may be lost, and thus the sample finally obtained will not represent the true proportions of constituents. Dry the sample in an air oven, grind with a spatula on a rough filter paper until it is thoroughly homogenous and pulverized. If it is properly washed and not dried too long it readily forms a fine powder. If any particles of dried oil or skin are observed, pass the sample through an 80-mesh sieve. This, however, should be avoided as much as possible by taking the sample of paste from below the surface, if the surface is at all dried. Some chemists...
